Abstract

Twitter is a social networking platform that connects its users to information in the form of posts that are a maximum of 140 characters long. Twitter has become an important method for news distribution for both print and broadcast news stations. News organizations, individuals and journalists all use Twitter for different purposes, which raises questions as to how local television news reporters tweets both as journalists and as individuals. This study analyzes the tweets of the personal Twitter accounts of five local television news reporters from each of the local television news stations in Toronto (City News, CTV Toronto, Global Toronto, CP24 and CBC Toronto). Findings reveal the existence of blurring of personal (individualistic) and professional (journalistic) uses of Twitter. The tweets from the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters in Toronto suggest that while these reporters still take their gatekeeping roles as journalists seriously, they sometimes take advantage of Twitter as a platform that encourages public declaration and personal observations.

Introduction

Twitter, a microblogging platform, was created in San Francisco, California and launched in October 2006 (Honey & Herring, 2009). Twitter users can send messages, called tweets, which are limited to 140 characters. Users can designate their tweets as public, which allows their tweets to appear on Twitter's public timeline located on the Twitter homepage (Honey & Herring, 2009). They can also direct their tweets to another individual user's Twitter page, known as feed, or users can make their tweets private, which means that only those who have subscribed to the user's feed, known as the user's followers, are able to see the tweets (Honey & Herring, 2009). Tweets can be posted via Twitter.com, mobile phones, and through third party desktop applications such as Hootsuite. The majority of Twitter users send and check tweets from their mobile devices (Palser, 2009).

Twitter is a social networking platform used as a news dissemination tool by both print and broadcast news organizations (Armstrong & Gao, 2010). Twitter has developed into a hybrid communication space that Papacharissi and de Fatima Oliveira (2012) characterize as “a complex and networked system of social awareness ... blurring boundaries between information, news, and entertainment” (p. 268). Twitter provides a platform where users are able to tweet a combination of information and observation, outside the boundaries of the established order of the information dissemination processes of traditional print or broadcast news (Hermida, 2012).

The Project for Excellence in Journalism (2009a) reported that Twitter is an important method for news distribution. In 2007, The Oregonian became one of the first newspapers to use Twitter as a news dissemination tool. Newspaper executives expected that multiple tweets throughout the day would build a community of readers who would initially be drawn in by tweets from the news organization, which gave them glimpses of the news. Newspaper executives then expected readers to seek longer articles on the news origination's website to attain further information. (Greer & Yan, 2011). By 2010, 197 out of 198 American newspapers and TV stations had an official Twitter account (Messner et al., 2011).

Various distinguished journalists in the news industry now have followings on Twitter that are almost as vast as the distribution of their newspapers or viewership of their news broadcast. For example, New York Times technology writer David Pogue went from 300,000 followers in 2009 to 1.4 million after only two years (Shultz & Sheffer, 2012). As the popularity of news reporters' Twitter accounts continues to grow, queries are raised pertaining to their roles on Twitter as both professional journalists and as individuals. Research has shown that an individual, a journalist and a news organization may all use Twitter for various purposes due to their varying personal and professional roles as Twitter users (Broersma & Graham, 2013; Java, Song, Finin, & Tsen, 2007; Lysak, Cremedas & Wolf, 2012; Schultz and Sheffer, 2010). The majority of newsrooms, however, use Twitter as a promotional tool. News organizations predominately forward print and broadcast stories to their Twitter feeds (Schultz & Sheffer, 2010), meaning that the same news is being delivered on different platforms in an attempt to help drive Twitter traffic to newsroom websites (Lysak, Cremedas & Wolf, 2012). While the general public uses Twitter for daily chatter, conversations, sharing information and links and reporting news (Java et al., 2007), journalists use Twitter to preview published work, report the news, communicate with other journalists, reach news sources, find more story ideas and verify information (Armstrong & Gao, 2010; Broersma & Graham, 2013). However, news reporters are also professionally tweeting from their personal Twitter account, which calls into question their role as an individual as well as their role as a journalist and how these roles are enacted in their tweets.

To date there have been no qualitative studies into how professional and personal uses of Twitter intersect in the context of broadcast journalism. This study aims to address this research gap and highlight the importance of understanding the individual and their profession through social media within the context of news reporting. This MRP examines how local television news reporters tweet from their personal accounts as professional journalists. The differences between how individuals, news organizations and journalists use Twitter will be explored in depth in order to demonstrate how journalistic and individual Twitter use can become blurred when personal accounts are used for professional purposes. The introduction of social media in the workplace has raised questions as to the boundaries concerning personal and professional online communication, making this study both timely and relevant. Moreover, this research will have implications not only for television news reporters, but also more broadly, for employees that tweet as both a professional and as an individual. This research will allow for a better understanding of an employee's dualistic role as a Twitter user.

Social Networking Sites

Social Networking Sites (SNS) are cyber environments that allow users to create profiles and distribute texts, images, and photos (boyd & Ellison, 2008; Pfeil et al., 2009; Powell, 2009; Tapscott, 2008). boyd and Ellison (2007) make a distinction between “social network site” and “social networking site” siding with the former term since the latter suggests these sites are primarily used to network. Networking, boyd and Ellison argue, is not the primary function of some social network sites. For example, YouTube is meant to share and post video content, not necessarily to network with other users, although networking can become a practice of YouTube as a platform should the user decide to use it as such. Specifically, boyd and Ellison define social network sites as online services that enable individuals to firstly, build a public or semi-public profile, secondly, create a list of other users with whom the individual shares a web-based connection, and lastly, examine and navigate their list of connections and the connections made by others in the system. boyd and Ellison assert that the unique quality of a social network site is not its ability to allow users to connect with strangers, but rather the capability for users to showcase their social networks on a web-based platform. This social network can result in connections between individuals. However, boyd and Ellison argue that on many of the popular SNS, users are not necessarily looking to meet new individuals but instead, they are principally communicating with individuals who previously existed in their extended social network. Thus, SNS enable users to present themselves on a web-based platform, connect to a network of users and cultivate and sustain relationships with that network (Ellison, Steinfield, & Lampe, 2007; Kane, Robinson-Combre, & Berge, 2009).

Social networking sites, now referred to more broadly as social media (Bhagwat & Goutam, 2013) have quickly become important social platforms through which to engage in computer-mediated communication (Powell, 2009; Tapscott, 2008). boyd and Ellison (2007) suggest that the first major social media platform was Sixdegrees.com, created in 1997. Since its introduction, hundreds of social media platforms have come to fruition, such as MySpace, Facebook, and Twitter. These social media platforms have captivated millions of users and social media is now integrated into the daily lives of many. There is a wide variety of social media platforms available to users, which support a vast range of interests and practices. While most of these platforms have consistent technological features, their uses and practices vary. Most platforms encourage the continuation of pre-established social networks. However, some platforms assist strangers to connect based on shared hobbies, interests and beliefs. Social media platforms also differ in terms of how the platform allows users to incorporate new information and communication tools, for example, blogging, mobile connectivity and sharing videos and photos (boyd & Ellison, 2007).

Social media brings together interpersonal communication, content production immediacy and large-scale distribution in a way that does not distinguish between personal and professional uses. It also does not have the same spatial, social, or temporal boundaries of print or broadcast media (boyd, 2010; Burgess & Bruns, 2012). Social media has made communication more social in various ways. Firstly, social media allows social interaction between groups and individuals, where users are able to talk back to companies or other individuals. Unlike print or broadcast communication, social media allows for a two-way dialogue (Baym, 2010). Second, social media permits communication synchronicity, which allows for very rapid transmission of messages, regardless of distance. This synchronicity can make individuals feel connected, even if they are geographically apart (Baym, 2010). Third, social media allows communication to reach vast audiences within wide boundaries. Messages can reach audiences both locally and globally, from anyone using the platform. This challenges the messages of mass media, as individuals through social media can spread messages on the same scale as broadcasters. Finally, social media allows communication mobility, enabling individuals to send and receive communication regardless of location.

Echoing Baym's sentiments, Zhao and Rosson (2009) suggest that Twitter as a communication platform allows for user connectedness, real-time information updating, easy mobility as well as vast reach due to the broadcast nature of social media messaging. Zhao and Rosson also suggest that Twitter, as a social media platform, encourages an affiliation with a network of other users and also encourages linking and relinking of information, allowing communication to be more social and collaborative in the transmission and consumption of messages. In this next section, communication on Twitter will be further discussed.

Twitter

Twitter is defined as a "real-time information network that connects users to the latest stories, ideas, opinions and news about what they [find] interesting" (Wasike, 2013, p. 8). Twitter has become the most popular microblogging site since its introduction in 2006 (Wasike, 2013). Twitter users can post status updates, also known as tweets, to their Twitter feed, which are then read by their followers. Twitter only allows 140 characters per tweet, which encourages those who use the social networking platform to be as brief and succinct as possible when disseminating information (Wasike, 2013).

Kwak, Lee, Park and Moon (2010) created a typology for Twitter, which distinguishes between three different Twitter interactions. Firstly, the authors describe the use of a singleton, which is also known as an undirected message, with no specification as to whom the message is directed. Secondly, the authors describe the use of the @ character, which facilitates a direct message. The @ signifies that this message is intended for a specific person. Thirdly, the authors identify the use of a retweet, which is used when a user will redeploy a tweet that was created by a different user. Finally, the authors recount the use of the # (hashtag) which signifies a theme that allows content to be grouped together by various users.

Scholars argue that Twitter provides a communicative space, which is affording the emergence of a new type of public realm called “personal public” (Wu, Hoffman, Mason & Watts, 2011). Wu et al. outline personal publics in contrast to the traditional publics afforded by journalistic media by defining it as a public where information is selected by criteria of personal relevance for a known, networked audience in a conversational mode. Three elements allow users of Twitter to create a personal public: (1) communication can be displayed according to criteria of personal relevance, rather than following journalistic news factors, (2) communication is addressed to a specific network, rather than being broadcast to an unknown mass audience, and, (3) communication occurs principally in conversational mode, rather than in the one-way mode of traditional media such as print. Twitter users view the platform as a personal media (Lüders, 2008), in that they have a large degree of control over what and how they communicated. Being able to select and present information of personal relevance is emerging as an expectation among Twitter users (Tufekci, 2011). Lastly, there is no strict separation between sender and receiver on Twitter, unlike other mass media. Twitter allows users to communicate in a conversational style, which enables senders of messages to quickly be the receivers and vice versa (Tufekci, 2011).

Twitter is a highly interlinked network structure that allows for rapid forms of news diffusion between users (Lerman & Ghosh, 2010). Meikles and Young (2012) have identified three trends in the way that Twitter is changing news: (1) news on Twitter is becoming linkable, (2) news involves sharing information among audiences and, (3) news is becoming conversational. Thus, users might choose to subscribe to the Twitter account of their favorite newspaper or TV station to get more diverse set of perspectives on current events. Twitter users can share and comment on those news items with their own network, and also get in touch with journalists to correct errors or suggest related information (Meikles & Young, 2012). In personal publics, instances of professional communication can share the same space with personal reflections. Users are able to select and share information of personal relevance based on who they believe their intended audience to be. As such, they are making information accessible that might be considered private, such as holiday stories, impressions from family events, one's current location or emotional state (Bruns, 2012). The decision to tweet or withhold an opinion, link or piece of information is based on the users' perception of their own audience. In the following section, specific instances of how journalists are using Twitter will be examined.

Journalistic Use Of Twitter

According to the Twitter website, this social media platform has changed the journalistic landscape (Twitter.com). Broersma and Graham (2013) suggest that journalists use Twitter for a range of purposes. They found, for example, that journalists use Twitter to generate leads, find sources, contribute content and verify information. Through interviews with journalists, Hermida (2010) found three main functions for journalistic use of Twitter: increasing accountability, newsgathering and building brand loyalty. Both of these definitions of journalistic Twitter use focus on sourcing and newsgathering for news stories. These definitions of journalistic Twitter use suggest that journalists use Twitter to obtain the opinions of the public via the internet, which can also be defined as crowdsourcing (Brabham, 2008).

Armstrong and Gao (2010) suggest a broader journalistic use of Twitter based on the data that Farhi (2009) collected from his interviews with Twitter experts. Armstrong and Gao propose that journalists use Twitter to preview published work, such as linking to their news stories on their news organization's website. Armstrong and Gao also suggest that journalists use Twitter to report the news, as they tweet about the latest news or current events. Journalists also use Twitter to communicate with other journalists, reach news sources and to find more story ideas, which indicates that journalists are using Twitter to converse with their colleagues and also for crowdsourcing.

Neuberger, vom Hofe and Nuernbergk (2013) conducted surveys in German newsrooms to examine the potential of Twitter as a communication tool for news organizations. Based on their findings, they suggest that journalists use Twitter to promote their content on newsroom websites, as seen in tweets that link to website content. This description of promotion is similar to how Armstrong and Gao described previewing published work. Neuberger et al. also suggest that journalists use Twitter to conduct real-time coverage from the scene of current news events, tweeting live reports, directly from where the events are taking place. Armstrong and Gao also note that reporters are routinely tweeting from various events such as speeches, conferences and sporting events, thus these two studies continue to parallel. Neuberger et al. suggest that journalists use Twitter to interact with members of the public, which is another instance of journalists using Twitter to have conversations, similarly suggested by Armstrong and Gao. Journalists also monitor audience reactions and follow up communication to their reports, exhibited in users tweeting to journalists and suggesting how journalists can improve their work. Finally, Neuberger et al. suggest that journalists use Twitter to investigate stories and conduct research on Twitter, insinuating the use of crowdsourcing, which is also noted as a journalistic use of Twitter by Armstrong and Gao (2010).

Neuberger et al.'s (2013) description of journalistic Twitter use is similar to Armstrong and Gao's, as both research suggests that journalists use Twitter to disseminate news, promote their work, engage in crowdsourcing and communicate with other journalists as well as individuals about their news stories. Since both of these studies identify the same journalistic uses of Twitter, these findings are integral to this study and will be used in the examination of how local television news reporters use their personal Twitter accounts to tweet journalistically.

Journalistic Norms and Practices on Twitter

Journalists are negotiating certain frictions that arise as the social affordances of Twitter intermingle with traditional journalistic conventions. They must engage in a process of negotiation between established norms and practices of journalism and the new communication tools that Twitter offers them. This MRP focuses on broadcast journalists and therefore the professional context in which they work is defined by the norms and practices that determine how journalists work. Over the years, journalists have established norms and practices key to their roles as non-partisan, transparent gatekeepers of information important to the public (Kovach & Rosenstiel, 2001). Journalism is coupled to the concept of objectivity or non-partisanship, which refers to newsgathering as a strictly fact-based process. The impartial methodology of reporting information has been deemed a paramount norm of the profession (Soloski, 1989). Specifically, journalists are expected to keep their values, politics and personal opinions to themselves (Kovach & Rosenstiel, 2007). Clarifying the origins of sources, or remaining transparent during the process of newsgathering, is also an essential practice of journalism.

Just as objectivity and transparency have been described as key professional norms in journalism, gatekeeping has also been considered another essential custom. Gatekeeping is a tradition of journalism that aims to separate opinion from fact and reporting from advocacy. Journalistic gatekeeping has been defined as journalists being able to claim authority over the capability to determine what qualifies as news and publish trustworthy and corroborated information (Hermida, 2013). The practice of gatekeeping developed principally in response to the shortage of news channels. These gates are metaphors for the doors of media organizations that control publishing technologies and thus monopolize how news is disseminated to the public (Singer, 2005). Gatekeepers must monitor these gates to guarantee that only correct information is relayed to the public. The 'inverted pyramid' style is a method of reporting the news that places the most important or substantial information at the head of the article and the remaining material follows, in order of diminishing importance (Kerrick, 1959). Traditional news media coverage is constantly restricted by the technical and commercial limitations of broadcast and print news channels, such as scope of message reach as well as relationships with advertisers. Thus it is the responsibility of editors and journalists to group the reports of several news sources into a single news story using the inverted pyramid style of journalism.

Online journalism allows for the media and their audience to be mutually connected. In an online setting, it is no longer critical for powerful gatekeepers to mediate between news sources and the general public, as was the case for journalists during the era of traditional mass media. On the Internet, journalists function more as a moderator and gatewatcher (Bruns 2005; Neuberger, vom Hofe & Nuernbergk, 2010). Online news websites have shifted the journalists' traditional role as gatekeepers into gatewatchers. Gatewatching has been defined as the journalists' ability to evaluate, highlight and publicize relevant information pulled from the internet (Bruns, 2004). Gatewatchers essentially broadcast news by directing to sources rather than by publishing it themselves or by assembling a complete report from the available sources. Gatewatching allows journalists to connect the reader to the first-hand information. The hyperlinked environment of the Internet has also made it possible for reporters to refer directly back to their online sources, reducing the journalistic need to noticeably demonstrate transparency. However, regardless of inducing a possible shift from the role of gatekeeper to gatewatcher, Twitter has the possibility to alter the established norms and practices of journalism (Lasorsa, Lewis & Holton, 2011; Sherwood & Nicholson, 2011).

Lasorsa, Lewis and Holton (2011) conducted a study on the extent to which Twitter may be changing journalistic norms and practices. Lasorsa et al. examined the Twitter accounts of 500 of the most followed journalists on Twitter, according to Muckrack.com. This group of 500 journalists worked for varying news organizations, such as national newspapers, local newspapers, national television broadcast news networks, cable news networks, online news websites and radio stations. Results showed that journalists were exhibiting non-traditional journalistic practices on Twitter. For example, journalists were sharing personal and opinionated information. This lessens the distinction between fact and opinion, as opposed to strictly abiding by the expectation that journalists should remain unbiased in their reporting (Broersma & Graham, 2013). In the study, journalists defended this intermingling of fact and opinion by emphasizing that news on Twitter is an “evolving story and that verification of sources and information takes place over time” (Broersma & Graham, 2013, p. 449). Lasorsa et al.’s study suggests that Twitter is an emerging communication space where news items can be shared along with personal updates. This is important for journalists because Twitter offers them a unique environment where they are free to communicate openly to a wide audience, without being constrained by organizational standards or traditional journalistic principles. Twitter is thus allowing journalists to be “more open with opinions, more liberal in sharing their gatekeeping role and more thorough in being transparent about the news process” (Lasorsa et al., 2012, p. 24).

Instances of personalization can be found in the tweets of journalists. Sherwood and Nicholson (2012) interviewed sports journalists in their study, which revealed that tweeting allowed journalists to showcase their personality and also gave them the ability to engage with readers. One sports journalist in the study noted that Twitter was a forum that allowed him to be less formal. The interviewee specifically mentioned that he tried not to be too serious on Twitter and noted that he thought Twitter was not a place for formalities (Sherwood & Nicholson, 2012). Thus, Sherwood and Nicholson’s findings suggest that Twitter allows journalists to be less formal and show their own personalities; separate from the news organization they work for. Moreover, according to Hermida, Fletcher, Korell and Logan (2012), audiences prefer to follow individual over institutional Twitter accounts, which also highlights the importance of individualization within journalistic Twitter use.

In contrast, Lasorsa et al. (2011) found that while some journalists habitually express opinion on Twitter, journalists who worked for elite news outlets, such as national newspapers, were less prone to relinquishing their gatekeeping role. They were also less likely to interact with other users by linking to external websites and sharing personal information. (Sherwood & Nicholson, 2012). As such, some journalists are not allowing Twitter to affect their roles as gatekeepers. Journalists are adopting these new social media platforms within the boundaries of traditional journalism (Sherwood & Nicholson, 2012). Research into journalism on social media shows that journalists and editors seek to retain a gatekeeping role, despite some opening up to the audience (Domingo, Quandt, Heinonen, Paulussen, Singer, & Vujnovic, 2008; Harrison, 2009; Hermida & Thurman, 2008). Hermida (2010) also suggests that journalists are not using social media to harness collective intelligence to verify information, as they still prefer to rely on elite, traditional sources that allow them to maintain their gatekeeping role. Interviews with journalists conducted by Hermida indicated that social media was a flexible tool that could be adapted to an individual's preferences and needs. This notion is further exemplified by Neuberger et al. (2013), who surveyed German news reporters from both print and broadcast journalism. In their survey findings, 58% of journalists rejected the contention that it is impossible to maintain journalistic standards when using a platform that only permits 140 characters of text. In this regard, the prevailing opinion is that tweets offer sufficient space for maintaining virtuous journalistic principles.

The aforementioned studies indicate that Twitter has the ability to compromise journalistic norms and practices. However, these studies vary in findings, suggesting that journalists are using Twitter in different ways and it is up their personal discretion as to how they chose to uphold their role as gatekeeper while using social media. Now that journalistic uses of Twitter have been explored, individualistic and organizational uses of Twitter will be examined in the following sections.

Use of Twitter by Individuals

Individuals use Twitter in comparable ways to journalists but also in some ways that differ. Java et al. (2007) examined how and why an individual uses Twitter and presented a taxonomy of user intentions. Java et al. generated their data by monitoring Twitter's public timeline of recent updates for a period of two months. From 76,177 individual users for this data, there were a total of 1,348,543 tweets. The objective of a Twitter post was deciphered by the researchers. Each post was read and categorized and posts that were highly ambiguous were placed in the “unknown” category. Based on this analysis, Java et al. indicate three factors motivating individuals to use Twitter: daily chatter (posts that talk about daily routines or what individuals were doing), conversations (tweets that started with the @ symbol followed by a username for reply) and sharing information and links (posts that contained some URL in them). This is significant to this research as sharing information can be considered relevant to journalism. Thus a blur between journalistic and individual uses of Twitter is evident in the description of individualistic uses of Twitter set forth by Java et al.

Zhao and Rosson (2009) propose a lengthier portrayal of individualistic uses of Twitter. Their findings suggest that individuals use Twitter for a variety of social purposes including raising visibility of interesting material to one’s social network, gathering useful information for one’s profession or other personal interests, keeping in touch with friends, seeking help and opinions, releasing emotion stress and lastly commenting on private life events such as family gatherings. While some of Zhao and Rosson’s findings differ from those of Java et al. (2007), such as using Twitter for emotional release, both findings suggest that individuals use Twitter as an information sharing and sending platform as well as a platform that allows one to keep in touch with other users. Both of these definitions suggest that sharing links and information as well as gathering useful information for one’s professions are individualistic uses of Twitter. These two aspects of individualistic Twitter use correspond with how journalists use Twitter. Sharing information and links and gathering information for one’s profession are analogous to news dissemination and crowdsourcing, which are two journalistic uses of Twitter. The intermingling of individualistic and journalistic Twitter uses is present within these two descriptions presented by Java et al. (2007) and Zhao and Rosson (2009). Thus, these two definitions suggest the potential for individualistic and journalistic Twitter uses being used in conjunction with each other.

Use of Twitter by News Organizations

News organizations are embracing Twitter as a means of promoting news stories to their followers on a platform other than print or broadcast. Research demonstrates that the majority of newsrooms use Twitter as a promotional tool (Schultz & Sheffer 2010; Lysak, Cremedas & Wolf 2012). Predominantly, news organizations forward print and broadcast stories to their Twitter feeds. Research has found that the same news is being delivered on different platforms, in an attempt to help drive Twitter traffic to newsroom websites (Armstrong & Gao, 2010; Palser 2009; Papacharissi & Oliveira, 2012; Stassen, 2010). Most newsrooms are automatically feeding the headlines of their website news stories to their Twitter pages (Palser, 2009). These studies demonstrate that news organizations are using their Twitter accounts primarily for promotional purposes, specifically, to showcase newsroom websites. In order to drive users to the newsroom websites, newsrooms are disseminating news stories that link back to website content.

Broersma and Graham (2013) examined nine news organizations during a period of four months to determine how links, news headlines, and mentions of individuals were employed within their tweets. They suggest that broadcast media are more inclined to employ multiple elements in tweeted stories (such as videos and audio recordings) when compared to print media. Canter (2014) concluded that the official Twitter accounts of newspaper organizations tended to post traditional automatic tweets, informal links to their website or share information rather than interact with readers. Both of these findings suggest that broadcast news organizations are more inclined to use interactive elements, just as photos and videos in their tweets (Burton & Soboleva, 2011), whereas print news organizations stray away from interactive features.

Unlike individualistic use of Twitter, research demonstrates that news organizations are not using Twitter to chat or have conversations. However, news organizations are using Twitter to disseminate news and to promote the news, which is similar to how individuals use Twitter to share information and report the news. Moreover, journalists use Twitter to share information and report the news as well, thus there are some similarities in how individuals, news organizations and journalists use Twitter. These definition overlaps may lead to possible blurring of personal and professional uses of Twitter and thus these definitions of Twitter use will be used to examine tweets from the Twitter accounts of local television news reporters.

This MRP will explore how individual local television news reporters use their personal Twitter accounts for journalistic and/or individualistic purposes. The content of tweets from individual Twitter accounts will be analyzed to explore the ways in which personal Twitter accounts conform to the literature on how journalists use Twitter, and as such, to what extent the tweets from the personal accounts of local television news reporters blur the boundaries between professional and personal communication.

Research Questions

As professional journalists, local television news reporters are using their personal Twitter accounts to tweet. While there is research that examines how journalists tweet in the professional, journalistic context (Armstrong and Gao, 2010) and there is research about how individuals tweet about non-professional, personal topics (Java et al., 2007), there is no research that explores whether there is an intersection between professional and personal tweeting. This study addresses this gap by analyzing the tweets of local television news reporters who use their personal Twitter accounts for professional purposes. Therefore the research questions that this MRP will be examining are:

RQ1. How do local television news reporters use their personal Twitter account for journalistic use?

RQ2. How do local television news reporters use their personal Twitter accounts for individualistic use?

RQ3. To what extent are journalistic and individualistic uses of Twitter blurred in the tweets from the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters?

Method

Qualitative content analysis has been defined as “a research method for the subjective interpretation of the content of text data through the systematic classification process of coding and identifying themes or patterns” (Hsieh & Shannon, 2005). Qualitative content analysis research concentrates on the features of language as communication with consideration to the contextual meaning or content of the text (Budd, Thorp & Donohow, 1967; Lindvist, 1981; McTavish & Pirro, 1990; Tesch, 1990). This research does not simply involve counting words, but rather analysis involves examining the language in order to categorize large amounts of text into groupings that have analogous meanings (Weber, 1990). Text data can be “verbal, print, or electronic form and might have been obtained from narrative responses, open-ended survey questions, interviews, focus groups, observations or print media such as articles, books or manuals” (Hsieh & Shannon, 2005, p. 1277).

Sample and Data Collection

For the purposes of this MRP, the text is composed of the tweets of local television news reporters. A local television news reporter is a broadcast journalist who reports the local news during the news hour. In Toronto, Ontario, Canada, there are five major local television news stations: City News, Global News Toronto, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation Toronto (CBC Toronto), CTV Toronto and CablePulse 24 (CP24). City News is owned by Rogers Media, Global News Toronto is owned by Shaw Media, CBC Toronto is owned by the Canadian government and CTV and CP24 are owned by Bell Media. The news hour for City News is at 5:00 p.m., Global News is at 5:30 p.m., CBC News is at 5:00 p.m., CTV News is at 6:00 p.m. and CP24 is at 5:00 p.m. Therefore, the news hour in Toronto ranges from 5:00 p.m. until 7:00 p.m.

The data collection commenced by gathering the names of all Toronto local television news reporters that report for a local news station during the news hour. All names of local television news reporters in Toronto were then placed into a spreadsheet with their corresponding news station also noted. From those names, reporters were distinguished between those who had a Twitter account and those who did not. There were a total of 57 local television news reporters in Toronto (this excludes anchors and weather specialists, as they do not qualify as news hour reporters). Of those 57 local television news reporters, 51 of them had a personal Twitter account.

Once it was determined that 51 local television news reporters had Twitter accounts, three reporters were selected from each local Toronto news television station (Global News, City News, CTV Toronto, CP24 and CBC Toronto) based on who had the highest number of total tweets, as well as who had the greatest number of followers. By taking into consideration the total number of tweets as well as number of followers, it was ensured that sufficient data would be collected from each Twitter account of the chosen local television news reporters.

Daily tweets of the top three reporters from each station were tracked for two weeks. Each day, the total number of tweets from each of the top three reporters was recorded in a spreadsheet. The reporters with the most tweets in the two-week period from each television news station were selected for the final sample. The top Twitter users from each local television news station in Toronto are shown in Table 1 below:

Table 1: Top Twitter Users From Each Local Television News Station In Toronto

Jackson Proskow	Global News	179
Steven D'Souza	CBC News	179
Avery Haines	City News	127

Paul Bliss	CTV News	76

Tweets were collected from March 31 until April 20 and archived into a spreadsheet. This spreadsheet also contained the name of the news reporter, Twitter handle, their affiliated news organization and the date of the tweet. By using this data collection method, effort was made to ensure that the data is representative and not unusual by collecting data for three weeks from each local news reporter from the five local television stations in Toronto. Originally, the plan was to collect data for four weeks. However, in order to ensure that that data was representative, the tweets from the fourth week were not included in the final data set. Mid-way through the fourth week, a breaking news story arose pertaining to Mayor Rob Ford's rehab departure. This news story was an isolated and unusual occurrence, which would disrupt the general news reporting practices of the five local television news reporters. However, the first three weeks provided sufficient data. The total number of tweets from March 31 until April 20, per reporter are shown in Table 2 below:

Data Analysis

After all tweets were recorded in the spreadsheet, the coding process occurred in three stages: coding for journalistic use, emergent coding for sub-codes of journalistic use and individualistic use and coding for differentiation between journalistic and individualistic use. The first qualitative content analysis occurred, coding for Twitter themes. Armstrong and Gao (2010)

defined journalistic Twitter use as previewing published work, reporting the news, communicating with other journalists and finding story ideas and reaching news sources. The tweets were first coded using Armstrong and Gao's description of journalistic Twitter use. Table 3 below shows the coding scheme that was used for the first round of coding on the data, using the following Twitter themes: previewing published work was labeled as Promotion and tweets that promoted news stories were coded as such. Reporting the news was labeled as News Dissemination and tweets that contained news stories were coded as such. Communicating with other journalists was labeled as Conversation, and tweets that demonstrated interaction between journalists were coded as such. Finally finding story ideas and reaching news sources was labeled as Crowdsourcing, and tweets that alluded to reporters reaching out for story sources were coded as such.

Table 3: Journalistic Twitter Themes

Theme	Definition	Sample
Promotion	Previewing published work	The Open Streets initiative could shut down 10 km of Bloor Street. http://ow.ly/vA2c4 @JProskowGlobal reports. #Topoli
News Dissemination	Reporting news stories	RT BREAKING: Ont. Premier Kathleen Wynne has served Tim Hudak and Lisa MacLeod with libel notice over gas plant allegations.
Conversation	Communicating with other journalists	@JProskowGlobal the best criminal defence lawyer in Canada?
Crowdsourcing	Reach news sources and to find more story ideas	Doing the twitter reach out: file your taxes online? worried you're going to get a letter from the CRA about stolen info? DM/Follow me.

After coding the data for Journalistic Twitter themes, five main Twitter categories emerged in the: News Dissemination, Promotion, Conversation, Crowdsourcing and Individualistic. Four of these categories were based on the journalistic Twitter use definitions of Armstrong and Gao (2010) and one additional category emerged in the data that was coded as Individualistic. These individualistic tweets contained personal musings usually reserved for individualistic use of Twitter as suggested by Java et al. (2007) and Zhao and Rosson (2009), such as posts that reveal how individuals go about their day-to-day lives.

Upon completion of the first round of coding for Twitter themes, sub-codes in the data emerged, which will now be overviewed. While coding for News Dissemination, the data indeed reflected the sharing of news or current events and these tweets were coded as Reporting The News. However, tweets were also coded as Real-Time Reporting, which qualified as live-tweeting events, where reporters would share what they were seeing and hearing at live events. Often reporters would describe their surroundings and quote speakers, similarly suggested in the definition of journalistic Twitter use as put forth by Neuberger et al. (2013). Table 4 below summarizes the News Dissemination category found within the data:

Table 4: Journalistic Category of News Dissemination and Sub-Codes

Category	Code	Definition	Sample
News Dissemination		Disseminating news stories
	Real-Time Reporting	Providing live reports via Twitter, directly from where the events were taking place	On the Porter item, there are still 7 councillors waiting to ask questions of staff -- that's before speakers, motions & debate.
	Reporting the News	Sharing the latest news or current events	Olivia Chow email to supporters soliciting donations: "Think of your gift as part of the say goodbye to Rob fund." #TOpoli

The coding for Promotion revealed that journalists were promoting their own newsroom's websites by referring and linking to newsroom website content and these tweets were coded as Promotion of Newsroom Website. However, other sub-codes emerged in the data within the category of Promotion as well. The news reporters promoted the televised newscast, encouraging their followers to tune in which transpired into the code Promotion of Newscast. The reporters also promoted their own work –for example, by retweeting compliments they received from fans about their stories and these tweets were coded as Promotion of Own Work. Table 5 below summarizes the Promotion category found within the data:

Table 5: Journalistic Category of Promotion and Sub-Codes

Category	Code	Definition	Sample
Promotion		Promoting and/or showcasing work
	Promotion of Own Work	Promotes own news story	RT@CityAvery @City News Another great story tonight! Congrats to Peter...he should be very proud of himself and his accomplishments!

	Promotion of Newscast	Promoted newsroom broadcasted newscast	Coming up on CBC Toronto at 5:30: Dramatic video showing the police interview with Jennifer Pan the night her mother was murdered #sl

Conversation tweets in the data did not reveal any sub-codes. Tweets in this category were coded as such if they were conversations taking place between two journalists. However, the term was broadened to include conversations between a journalist and their followers, discussing the news story of the journalist. Follow-up conversations pertaining to reporting was a journalistic use of Twitter suggested by Neuberger et al. (2013). Table 6 below summarizes the Conversation category within the data:

Table 6: Journalistic Category of Conversation

Category	Code	Definition	Sample
Conversation		Communicating with other journalists and following up communication to about their reports with followers	@reporterdonpeat I guess that's better than taking a mile?

Moreover, there were no sub-codes for the theme of Crowdsourcing. The data was coded as such if the tweets from the reporters alluded to their need for a source of the story. Table 7 below summarizes the Crowdsourcing category:

Table 7: Journalistic Category of Crowdsourcing

Category	Code	Definition	Sample
Crowdsourcing		Reach news sources and to find more story ideas	Doing the twitter reach out: file your taxes online? worried you're going to get a letter from the CRA about stolen info? DM/Follow me.

Finally, while coding the data for Twitter themes, a new theme emerged from and was labeled Individualistic. Tweets were coded as Individualistic if they could not be categorized as one of the journalistic Twitter themes such as News Dissemination, Promotion, Conversation or Crowdsourcing. Sub-codes within Individualistic tweets also emerged, including codes for Personal Interest, Private Life and Daily Chatter. Tweets coded as Personal Interest alluded to the personal hobbies of the journalists, such as sports or music. Tweets were coded as Private Life when journalists would share emotional expressions or information usually reserved for friends and family such as holiday stories or impressions of family events. Daily Chatter tweets were coded for when journalists' talked about daily routines or kept in touch with friends and family.

From the literature, these codes related to individualistic use of Twitter. Java et al. (2007) suggested the discussion of one's daily routines as an individualistic use of Twitter. Moreover, Zhao and Rosson (2009) indicated that chatting with friends, showcasing information they personally deem interesting, revealing one's emotional state and commenting on impressions of private life event such as family gatherings were also individualistic uses of Twitter. Table 8 below summarizes the Individualistic category and its various sub-codes:

	Private Life	Information usually reserved for friends and family such as holiday stories, impressions from family events or revealing one's emotional state	The happy couple the night before the wedding! pic.Twitter.com/RorSPW8JBi
	Daily Chatter	Posts that keep in touch with friends or talk about daily routines	Today's TTC experiment: left 20 minutes late to skip to queen streetcar rush. Much faster trip, no crowding, still made It to work on time.

Based on this first round of coding, it was evident that the tweets from the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters did not always qualify as Journalistic. Thus, once these categories and sub-codes were established in terms of Twitter themes, the data was then coded for the following Twitter uses: Journalistic, Individualistic and Individualized Journalistic. Each tweet was coded for the aforementioned uses, based on the journalistic Twitter use definitions put forth by both Armstrong and Gao (2010) and Neuberger et al. (2013) and the individualistic twitter use definitions of Java et al. (2007) and Zhao and Rosson (2009). The tweets that did not qualify solely as Journalistic or Individualistic, but rather a synthesis of the two uses, were coded as Individualized Journalistic.

If a tweet disseminated the news, promoted the news, engaged in crowdsourcing, or lastly if a tweet alluded to a conversation between journalists or a user and journalist discussing a news story, then it was coded as Journalistic. If a tweet qualified as daily routines, keeping in touch with friends, releasing emotional stress, raising visibility of personal interests and commenting on private life events, then it was coded as Individualistic. If a tweet exemplified characteristics of both journalistic and individualistic uses of Twitter, then it was coded as Individualized Journalistic.

Within the category of Individualized Journalistic, two sub-codes emerged in the data: Opinion-Based News and Personal Lives On Display. The former sub-code consisted of news stories that demonstrated the reporters' opinion of the news story. For instance, the following tweet from Jackson Proskow of Global News, highlights his personal opinion embedded in news dissemination: "A strange mob scene as people run to line-up to buy Bobbleheads and merchandise." Proskow demonstrates his personal opinion by suggesting that the mob is “strange” but also engages in real-time reporting, by covering the Rob Ford mayoral convention he is in attendance for.

The second sub-code within Individualized Journalists use is Personal Lives on Display. These were tweets that are work-related, but also put the personal lives of the journalists on display, such as revealing aspects of one’s day-to-day life or private life. For example, Jackson Proskow of Global News tweeted: “(For the record, I will be at council a little later on today...)”. This tweet fulfills journalistic use by promoting the location of his story. This tweet is also individualistic in use as Proskow is informing his followers of his daily whereabouts. Both of these two individualized journalistic sub-codes demonstrate personal opinions and/or information from the reporter. The tweets that were categorized as Individualized Journalistic were then re-coded to reflect these sub-codes. Table 9 below summarizes the coding scheme used to code these Individualized Journalistic tweets:

Table 9: Individualized Journalistic Category and Sub-Codes

Findings and Discussion

This section presents the findings and discussion of the qualitative content analysis conducted on the tweets of local television news reporters. This qualitative analysis aimed to answer the research questions by identifying themes of the tweets from the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters. Table 11 below summarizes the Journalistic, Individualistic and Individualized Journalistic tweets within the data. As demonstrated from these numbers, there were no visible similarities or patterns amongst the reporters in terms of how often they tweeted journalistically, individualistically or intermixing them both.

Table 11: Journalistic, Individualistic and Individualized Journalistic Uses of Twitter

	Proskow	D'Souza	Haines	Simpson	Bliss	Total	% of Total Tweets (n= 813)
Journalistic tweets	162	125	28	206	78	599	74%
Individualistic tweets	6	10	6	21	23	66	8%
Individualized Journalistic tweets	42	15	37	14	40	148	18%

The following section divides the findings into Journalistic, Individualistic and Individualized Journalistic uses of Twitter, examining the Twitter themes found in each of the aforementioned uses.

RQ1. How do local television news reporters use their personal Twitter account for journalistic use?

Armstrong and Gao (2010) identified four types of Twitter usage by journalists: News Dissemination, Promotion, Conversation and Crowdsourcing. The majority of the data (74%) was coded as Journalistic (599/813), suggesting that the majority of the tweets from the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters were used journalistically. None of tweets coded as Journalistic alluded to aspects of individualization. For example, in this tweet, Jackson Proskow of Global News, includes information that is entirely related to a news event:

“BREAKING> From the ITO, Rob Ford is "going mad" about the video.

pic.twitter.com/7IPOfgaWF7”. Similarly, Steven D’Souza, CBC News, tweeted: “Packed courtroom awaiting appearance of Chuang Li, suspect in yesterday's workplace stabbing. Court waiting for Mandarin interpreter”. These are both examples of journalistic use of Twitter, as the main function of both tweets is to disseminate the news.

Table 12 below shows the four major Twitter themes that were found in the tweets coded as Journalistic, as well as breaks down each category by journalist. These four themes used journalistically were: News Dissemination, Promotion, Conversation and Crowdsourcing. The data demonstrates that tweets coded as News Dissemination made up the majority of the Journalistic tweets, suggesting that local television news reporters use their personal Twitter accounts to tweet journalistically, and specifically, to tweet the news. However, there appears to be little similarity in terms of tweeting patterns among the reporters, suggesting that although Twitter is one platform, the same for all journalists, it was used to tweet journalistically in differing ways. For example, Jackson Proskow, Steven D’Souza, Katie Simpson and Paul Bliss all tweet the news the most within journalistic Twitter use, yet Bliss does not tweet promotionally to the same extent as his counterparts and Proskow does not use conversational tweets, whereas the remaining reporters do.

Table 12: Categories of Journalistic Twitter Use

Category	Proskow	D'Souza	Haines	Simpson	Bliss	Total Tweets of Category	% of Journalistic Tweets (n= 599)	% of Total Tweets (n= 813)
News Dissemination	117	81	2	156	63	419	70%	52%
Promotion	44	41	22	40	4	151	25%	19%
Conversation	0	1	2	8	10	21	4%	3%
Crowdsourcing	1	2	2	2	1	8	1%	1%
Total	163	12	28	206	78

1.1 Journalistic Use of News Dissemination

Within the tweets coded as Journalistic, 70% were coded as News Dissemination, making it the most prominent category of journalistic tweets. Table 13 below summarizes the News Dissemination category and its sub-codes according to each reporter's use. Within the News Dissemination category, there were two distinct patterns of Twitter use. The first was coded as Real-Time Reporting, which qualified as live-tweeting events, where reporters would share what they were seeing and hearing at live events. The second was coded as Reporting the News, which were tweets that shared the headlines of news or current events, synthesizing the news in a single tweet.

Table 13: News Dissemination Sub-Codes

Sub-Codes of News Dissemination	Proskow	D'Souza	Haines	Simpson	Bliss	Total
Real-Time Reporting	84	49	2	86	31	252
Reporting the News	33	32	0	70	32	167
Total News Dissemination						419

1.1.1 Real-Time Reporting

Jackson Proskow of Global News dominated the sub-code of Real-Time Reporting. Of Proskow's total tweets (n=210), 40% of them were coded as Real-Time Reporting, which was the largest percentage out of all of the reporters. Real-Time reporting is a distinct form of news dissemination that is unique to Twitter, as the platform allows for the instantaneous dissemination of what a reporter is seeing, hearing and experiencing. An example of Real-Time Reporting from Proskow is as follows: "Mammoliti: 'the majority of the email's that I'm getting are from women who love the expansion.'" In this tweet Proskow is directly relaying word-for-word what he is hearing from the speaker. This constitutes as Real-Time Reporting because Proskow is providing a live report directly from the event he is attending. Another example of Proskow's use of Real-Time Reporting is exemplified in his tweet: "At City Hall where Mayor Rob Ford silently walked to the elevator. He hurt his back lifting weights on Friday (according to his driver)." This tweet is another instance of Real-Time Reporting because Proskow is relaying what he is witnessing while at City Hall, immediately relaying this information to his followers via Twitter.

A news beat is defined as particular topic or subject area that a reporter covers (Reich, 2012). Proskow's beat is city politics, which includes reporting on events at City Hall as well as all stories relating to Toronto Mayor Rob Ford. Proskow uses Real-Time Reporting to a large extent for his stories as he is constantly at City Hall, relaying what he is witnessing through his tweets. This is significant because Proskow's tweeting habits demonstrate how he uses his personal Twitter account primarily to disseminate the news, specifically to engage in Real-Time Reporting. Thus, Proskow is using his personal Twitter account as an extension of his professional news reporting. Proskow's use of Real-Time Reporting is distinct from the other reporters as he is a beat reporter, focusing on City politics and thus real-time reporting lends itself well to his specific journalistic task of relaying all that he experiences while at City Hall.

Neuberger et al. (2013) conducted a comprehensive newsroom survey completed by editors-in-chief of Internet news departments in Germany, including daily newspapers, weekly newspapers, TV/radio broadcasters and internet-only providers. The study by Neuberger et al. (2013) also found that German Newsrooms employed Real-Time Reporting on Twitter. News departments often provided live reporting of recurring events such as sports events and awards and presentations. Their study also suggested that during elections, live reporting is also a prominent use of Twitter. The survey findings of Neuberger et al. correspond with the findings of this study, as both suggest Real-Time Reporting on Twitter as an extension of journalistic practice.

1.1.2 Reporting The News

Reporting The News was the other category of Journalistic Twitter use. Katie Simpson of CP24 tweeted the news the most out of her counterparts, as 30% (n=70) of Simpson's total tweets were coded as Reporting the News. Simpson states on her Twitter profile biography that she is a "Breaking news enthusiast". Simpson's beat is breaking news, which means she is constantly abreast of the latest news in order to disseminate information rapidly to her Twitter followers. An example of Simpson's use of Reporting the News can be seen in her tweet: "News release from Peel Region: POSSIBLE MEASLES EXPOSURE AT ULTIMATE SPORTSPLEX (RINK CITY) IN MISSISSAUGA ON MARCH 22, 2014." In this tweet, Simpson is reporting the news by releasing information about a news release from Peel Region. Another example can be seen in her tweet: "#BREAKING: One person stabbed at St. Roch Catholic SS in Brampton; possibly 2nd vic. One person in custody, hunt on for second suspect.” In this tweet, Simpson is sharing breaking news with her followers by reporting information about a stabbing in a school.

Simpson, like Proskow, also demonstrates in her tweeting patterns that she too uses her personal Twitter account primarily to disseminate the news. However, she is disseminating the news differently than Proskow and the rest of the reporters because her beat is specifically breaking news. Of the tweets coded as Reporting The News, 28 contained the word “Breaking” at the beginning of the tweet and 27 of those tweets were from Simpson. Thus, Simpson is using her personal Twitter account to fulfill her journalistic task of sharing breaking news. Simpson’s use of Twitter to report the news is unique to her own reporting beat and thus she is using Twitter to tweet journalistically in a different way than her counterparts.

These findings suggest that journalists are usually able to uphold their roles as gatekeepers by tweeting impartial news. Within the tweets coded as Journalistic, reporters disseminated news stories that showed no instances of personalization, thus did not demonstrate any sense of bias. Local television news reporters also linked to stories composed by competing newsroom reporters within the category of News Dissemination. These tweets suggest that reporters are enacting their roles as gatewatchers (Bruns, 2005), as they do not necessarily have to promote their own news story as the most pertinent news. Rather, they are able to broadcast other news items that they deem suitable and acceptable news for their followers to consume.

Even within a 140-character limit, journalists were able to employ the inverted pyramid style of reporting (Kerrick, 1959) through reporting the news tweets. Rather than the important information being at the head of the article, the significant material is located in the tweet. For example, D’Souza tweeted a headline of a news article and linked the remaining content of the article in the latter part of the tweet: “RT After major internet security flaw "Heartbleed", experts advise: Wait a day then change all your passwords <http://nyti.ms/1kp4Pje>.” The headline of this story, as in who, what, where, when why, is found in the body of this tweet. The information usually reserved for the remainder of the article is now linked in the tweet, allowing users to read the rest of the news story on the news organization’s website.

1.2 Journalistic Use of Promotion

Tweets coded as Promotion were the second most predominantly used category for all reporters. The category of Promotion consisted of tweets that allowed journalists to preview published work. Table 14 below summarizes the Promotion category and its sub-codes according to each reporter’s use. Within the Promotion category, there were three patterns of Twitter use. The first was Promotion of Own Work, which was when a reporter promoted his or her own work. The second was Promotion of Newsroom Website which were tweets that contained newsroom website links, such as links to live streams or news stories. The final code was Promotion of Newscast, in which reporters promoted their newsroom’s televised newscast, encouraging Twitter users to tune in.

Table 14: Promotion Sub-Codes

Sub-Codes of Promotion	Proskow	D’Souza	Haines	Simpson	Bliss	Total
Promotion of Own Work	8	5	20	10	2	45
Promotion of Newsroom Website	36	27	2	22	2	89
Promotion of Newscast	0	9	0	8	0	17
Total Promotion						151

1.2.1 Promotion of Own Work

Within the promotional category, Promotion of Own Work was the most frequent code. Avery Haines of City News was the reporter who promoted her stories the most by tweeting self-promotions 20 times or 44% of all tweets coded as Promotion of Own Work. An example of Haines's self promotion is exhibited in the following tweet: "Her toddler was stabbed to death by a mentally ill neighbour. Meet the mum who wants CHANGE, not REVENGE. VIDEO: <http://tinyurl.com/ohclky3>." Haines's beat is human-interest stories and she has her own segment during the news hour called Inside Story. Haines uses her personal Twitter account to self-promote in order to fulfill her journalistic task of promoting her human-interest segment on the news hour.

1.2.2 Promotion of Newsroom Website

Promotion of Newsroom Website was another prominent code of journalistic use of Twitter. These tweets are distinct because they contain a link to the reporter's newsroom website. Reporters are able to use Twitter as a promotional tool by driving traffic to the newsroom website. All of the local television news reporters promoted their newsroom's website by linking to news stories. Other instances of website promotion were shown in tweets that promoted the live stream coverage of events on newsroom websites. Steven D'Souza of CBC News was the reporter who promoted his newsroom's website content the most out of all the reporters. Out of his total tweets, 18% of them (n=150) were coded as Promotion of Newsroom Website, and thus 18% of his tweets contained a link to the CBC website.

Examples of how D'Souza promoted his newsroom's website are demonstrated in the following tweets: "Mississauga company fires flight instructor after CNN appearances on Malaysia Airlines story - Toronto - CBC News <http://www.cbc.ca/1.2613065> ", and "You can watch the Rob Ford official campaign launch LIVE here: <http://www.cbc.ca/1.2613334>".

Through these tweets, D'Souza is leading those who follow his Twitter feed to his newsroom website, either to read a news story or to watch a live stream. Thus, D'Souza uses his personal Twitter account to promote his newsroom's website by circulating links. D'Souza heavily uses Twitter as a platform for promotion.

Promoting stories on a news website is a practice of Twitter usually reserved for newsroom organizational uses of Twitter. Greer and Ferguson (2011) found that linked news stories were the most frequently occurring items on the Twitter homepages of news organizations. Moreover, research demonstrates that the majority of newsrooms use Twitter as a promotional tool (Schultz & Sheffer 2010; Lysak, Cremedas & Wolf 2012). The journalists examined in this study also used Twitter as a promotional tool at very high rates. These findings suggest that when local television news reporters are using their personal Twitter accounts to tweet journalistically, they are somewhat emulating the same tweeting practices of news organizations.

1.2.3 Promotion of Newscast

In the data set, there were tweets coded as Promotion of Newscast, but only Steven D'Souza of CBC News and Katie Simpson of CP24 promoted their newsroom's televised newscast. For example, Simpson encouraged her Twitter followers to tune into CP24 in this tweet: "RT Mayor Ford is speaking with reporters at city hall. Tune into CP24 for LIVE coverage." The remaining journalists promoted their newsroom live stream by linking to the online content, but never promoted the broadcasted newscast. This suggests that the majority of the journalists are prioritizing the promotion of their newsroom's website over promoting the televised newscast.

Greer and Ferguson (2011) found broadcast news stations rarely promoted their newscasts and news organizations were primarily interested in driving traffic to the newsroom website. Based on findings, the same organizational Twitter practices can be applied to the five examined local television news reporters. They too promoted their newsrooms website by linking to its content at higher rates and rarely promoted the televised newscast of their news organization.

1.3 Journalistic Use of Conversation

All local television news reporters, except for Jackson Proskow of Global News, had tweets coded as Conversation. Tweets in the category of Conversation were coded as such if they were conversations taking place among journalists or between a journalist and their followers, discussing the news story of the journalist. Paul Bliss of CTV News had the most tweets coded as Conversation, as almost 50% of all tweets coded as Conversation were from Bliss's Twitter account. Selected conversations occurred between Bliss and a Twitter follower, in an attempt to follow up communication pertaining to a news story. These conversations were classified as journalistic use of Twitter, suggested by Neuberger et al. (2013). The other type of conversations that Bliss participated in were conversations between himself and other journalists, which is a journalistic use of Twitter presented by Armstrong and Gao (2010).

Bliss was the most social on Twitter due to his high rates of conversational tweets. Bliss, unlike his counterparts, often engaged in conversations and focused more on interacting with reporters and his followers than on other journalistic uses such as Promotion or News Dissemination. For example, Bliss had a conversation with one of his followers about the statistics he had used for a story: “.@RobLearn I got the numbers from the sentence directly below the chart you tweeted. Now you can be sure. pic.twitter.com/USabuZJyL5”.

These tweets coded as Conversation demonstrate that journalists, and specifically Bliss, are using their personal Twitter accounts to have conversations pertaining to their news stories, either engaging in conversations with other journalists or their Twitter followers. Bliss's substantial use of Twitter as a mode of conversation highlights his use of Twitter as an extension of his journalistic task to converse with other journalists and the public.

Tweets coded as Conversation also appeal to the notion of journalistic transparency, which is a norm that the profession strives to uphold (Kovach & Rosenstiel, 2001). By engaging in conversations with fellow journalists, in public on Twitter as well as with Twitter followers who consume news stories, journalists are able to remain transparent about where they gather their facts and how they present news stories. Within the data, there were demonstrated instances of journalists interacting with one another with regards to the same news story. For example when Avery Haines tweeted at Toronto Sun reporter Don Peat: “@reporterdonpeat I guess that's better than taking a mile?”. These two were engaged in a conversation pertaining to the Toronto City Hall budgets in which both of them were reporting on.

There were also occurrences of conversations among journalists and their Twitter followers who were asking for clarification on sources and facts presented in the story. Thus, these types of conversations from the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters exemplify the journalistic norm of transparency. As suggested by the study of Lasorsa et al. (2012), journalists used Twitter as an opportunity to provide transparency. The findings of Lasorsa et al. demonstrate that journalists can use Twitter to convey information about their job, engage in discussions about their reporting as well as link to information in which they attained for their news story. These Twitter practices uphold the journalistic norms of transparency. Moreover, these journalistic tweets coded as Conversation align with the conversational style of communication afforded by a personal public, as described by Wu et al. (2011).

1.4 Journalistic Use of Crowdsourcing

All of the crowdsourcing tweets in the data were coded as Journalistic. These tweets qualified as crowdsourcing as they were asking for the opinions of the public through Twitter about news-related issues. Although crowdsourcing comprised a small percent of the overall data (1% of Journalistic tweets), all of the reporters employed crowdsourcing at least once in their tweets for journalistic purposes. For example, two of the tweets coded as Crowdsourcing were requesting public opinion, such as using an opinion poll. Others included asking for a photo as well as seeking a source for a story. Even though all of the journalists used a tweet to engage in crowdsourcing at least once, they all employed them in different ways. For example, Paul Bliss of CTV News asked for his followers to use a specific hashtag when replying to his request for an opinion poll, while Katie Simpson of CP24 asked her followers to private message her on Twitter if they qualified as a suitable source for a story she was working on. Thus, although the journalists all use their personal Twitter accounts for crowdsourcing, they do so varyingly. Moreover, the journalistic use of crowdsourcing on Twitter also upholds the norm and practice of journalistic transparency, as these tweets allow Twitter users to see how and where a journalist compiled their information for a news story.

Broersma and Graham (2013) and Hermida (2010) suggest that journalists use Twitter to generate leads, find sources, and contribute content. Thus, these researchers emphasize the importance of Twitter as a crowdsourcing tool for journalists. However, crowdsourcing was the most infrequently used code for journalistic use in this study. This finding is consistent with the findings of Neuberger et al. (2013). Their survey found that only 12% of the news departments used Twitter to find sources and stories. Thus, crowdsourcing in their survey was not a prominent journalistic use of Twitter, consistent with the findings within the data of this study.

Neuberger et al. (2013) suggest that Twitter, compared to other computer-based research tools, is relatively unimportant for investigative purposes. In terms of finding story ideas, Neuberger et al. indicate that journalists use other social media platforms such as blogs over Twitter to find story sources. For checking facts and figures, Neuberger et al. suggest that journalists use search engines and online journals. Neuberger et al. refer to Twitter as being a tool for soft research goals, such as gaining a sense of public moods or trends, but not for gathering facts and background information or crosschecking information for news stories.

RQ2. How do local television news reporters use their personal Twitter accounts for individualistic use?

Individualistic use of Twitter was enacted by all of the reporters. All of these instances reveal that journalists are not using their personal Twitter accounts exclusively to tweet journalistically. Journalists, at times, are using their personal Twitter accounts to tweet personal information, which is non-journalistic in nature. As such, when using their personal Twitter accounts, journalists do occasionally cross over the boundaries from journalistic use into individualistic use.

There were 66 instances (or 8%) of individualized content in the data. Within the category of Individualistic Use of Twitter, there were three distinct patterns of Twitter use. The first was coded as Personal Interest, qualifying as tweets that revealed the reporters' hobbies and/or interests. The second code was Daily Chatter and these were tweets where the reporter would share the events of their day-to-day lives, such as where they were going or what they were doing, or keeping in touch with friends. The third and final individualistic use was coded as Private Life, which consisted of tweets where a reporter would share information usually reserved for friends or family. Of note, three out of the five reporters tweeted individualistic content at higher rates than other journalistic uses of Twitter on weekends. The individualistic tweets on weekends alluded to reporters' personal lives, outside of the office. These tweets allow the journalists' Twitter followers to view the reporters as every-day, regular citizens.

Table 15 below breaks down the individualistic uses of Twitter by each local television news reporter, revealing a lack of consistency among the reporters in terms of how they tweeted individualistically. The data demonstrates that Paul Bliss of CTV News used his personal Twitter account for individualistic purposes to the greatest extent compared to his counterparts. Thus, Bliss was the most individualistic in his use of Twitter.

Table 15: Individualistic Twitter Use

Category	Proskow	D'Souza	Haines	Simpson	Bliss	Total Tweets of Category	% of Individualistic Tweets (n= 66)	% of Total Tweets (n= 813)
Personal Interest	1	6	3	1	19	30	45%	4%
Daily Chatter	3	4	3	8	3	21	32%	3%
Private Life	2	0	0	12	1	15	23%	2%
Total	6	10	6	21	23	66

Individualistic uses of Twitter allowed followers to gain insights into the reporters' personal hobbies and interests such as astronomy, television shows, sports, film and travel. Paul Bliss of CTV News prominently disseminated information about his personal interests, in particular, his fascination with astronomy. In fact, 100% (n=19) of Bliss's tweets coded as Personal Interest pertained to space and astronomy. From these tweets, it became apparent that Bliss was passionate about astronomy, as he frequently tweeted about this interest. The other reporters tweeted about their hobbies and interests too; however, not to the same extent as Bliss. For example, from the tweets categorized as Individualistic, one can possibly conclude that Katie Simpson of CP24, enjoys basketball (“wethenorth not #wearenorth #fail #sloganmelting”), Steven D’Souza of CBC News, likes soccer (“Why is there no @torontofc on the radio?”), Jackson Proskow of Global News, relishes travel (“Soaking up the sunshine in Niagara this weekend”) and Avery Haines of City News enjoys humourous cat videos (elly.com/1IPSQU6 - Cat vs coon. Part 1. VIDEO).

Through individualistic uses of Twitter, reporters were able to engage in non-journalistic practices such as wishing their followers a happy holiday, as seen in a tweet by Steven D’Souza of CBC News: “Happy Easter!”. Reporters were also able to vent their personal thoughts, as demonstrated by Katie Simpson of CP24: “Ok cold...you win ...” By using Twitter individually, these tweets demonstrate that the local television news reporters are members of the community in which their followers live in, and they too experience the same holidays, weather troubles, etc. as others residing in the region.

When reporters used Twitter individually, they revealed information about their private lives. Katie Simpson from CP24 was the reporter who most notably tweeted about her personal life. For example, in one tweet, Katie Simpson of CP24 publicized that she was at a friend’s wedding: “Amazing wedding! Congrats Jen & Shep! pic.twitter.com/UOhgWvDKRG”. Simpson dominated the Private Life code. Topics of her private life tweets included bachelorette parties, birthday parties, weddings and family time. These tweets coded as Private Life gave Simpson’s Twitter followers a glimpse into her life outside of the office and allowed them to see the personal side of Simpson.

These individualistic uses of Twitter align with the findings of both Java et al. (2007) and Zhao and Rosson (2009). These researchers suggest that individuals use Twitter to discuss the daily routines of their lives, chat with friends, showcase information deemed interesting, release emotional stress and comment on impressions of private life events. Each one of these proposed categories of individualistic use of Twitter were coded in the data set of this study, thus aligning with the findings of the two aforementioned studies. None of the these individualistic categories were described in the literature as uses relating to journalists or news organization, thus none of these categories are expended beyond the scope of individualistic use (Palser 2009; Papacharissi & Oliveira 2012; Schultz & Sheffer 2010; Stassen 2010).

Tweets coded as Individualistic are informal in approach, framing journalists as ordinary individuals rather than authoritative gatekeepers who control access to the news. Being “human” is an essential component in creating one’s personality on social media (Marwick & boyd, 2011). Based on these findings, by using their personal Twitter accounts, these journalists are able to appear more human by sharing morsels of information about their family and social lives (Cozma & Chen 2013; Lasorsa, Lewis, & Holton 2012). As demonstrated by tweets coded as Personal Interest, Daily Chatter and Private Life, the journalists’ Twitter followers were able to observe how these reporters live their lives outside of work.

Free online news websites have created economic turmoil for the news industry. This upheaval in journalism has caused the termination of numerous paid journalist jobs (Sheffer & Schultz, 2012). Thus, newspaper reporters must be more attuned to the changing environment and ways of maintaining relevance in a digital age. As competition grows, reporters are beginning to understand the importance of their own individualistic voice as journalists. By tweeting as individuals, reporters are able to deviate from the traditional norms and practices of journalism and move away from the customary approach of presenting the neutral face of the news organization they work for (Sheffer & Schultz, 2012). Instead, journalists can begin to share aspects of their personal lives with their followers through their individualistic Twitter practices (Canter, 2013).

RQ3. To what extent are journalistic and individual uses of Twitter blurred in the tweets from the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters?

At times, tweets demonstrated instances of journalistic as well as individualistic uses of Twitter in the same tweet. When both uses of Twitter were present in the tweets, they were coded as Individualized Journalistic, alluding to both uses employed in the tweet. Within the data set, 148 of the total tweets (or 18%) were coded as using Twitter in an individualized journalistic way. This makes up almost one fifth of the data. In these tweets the journalists engaged in journalistic uses of Twitter, such as News Dissemination or Promotion. However, concurrently, these tweets demonstrated instances of individualistic uses of Twitter by infusing personal opinion in the message or revealing aspects of the journalist's personal life.

Paul Bliss of CTV News enacts an example of a tweet coded as Individualized Journalistic: "There should be a mechanism in the Legislature that FORCES politicians to answer direct questions..and not deflect onto message track." While Bliss is tweeting journalistically about politics in this tweet, he is also tweeting individualistically by infusing his personal opinion as to how the government should function. Thus, this tweet is an example of when journalistic and individualistic uses of Twitter become blurred.

Another example of individualized journalistic use is demonstrated by Jackson Proskow of Global News: "While working on a decidedly non-Rob Ford story about traffic today, Rob Ford & driver pulled up at the traffic light I was standing at. I gave them a wave. They waved back, and rolled down the window to say hi. Sometimes Toronto feels like a really big small town."

This tweet demonstrates journalistic use as Rob Ford stories and Toronto city politics are Proskow's beat. However, this tweet also employs individualistic use of Twitter as Proskow is communicating to his followers aspects of his personal life, specifically the daily happenings of his life when he saw Rob Ford while they were both stuck in traffic. Thus, this tweet is being deployed for both journalistic and individualistic intentions. Even within the 140-characters of a tweet, Twitter seems to provide opportunities for the local television news reporters to tweet simultaneously as both journalists and individuals.

Table 16 below shows the breakdown of each reporter's use of individualized journalistic tweets. This data reveals that the reporters blur individual and journalistic uses of Twitter in two ways: the first coded as Opinion-Based News, which qualifies as infusing personal opinions into news stories. The second coded as Personal Lives On Display, which were tweets that revealed aspects of their personal lives in a work-related context.

Table 16: Reporters' Use of Individualized Journalistic Tweets

Category	Proskow	D'Souza	Haines	Simpson	Bliss	Total	% of Individualized Journalistic Tweets (n=148)	% of Total Tweets (n= 813)
Opinion-Based News	30	9	23	11	21	94	64%	12%
Personal Lives on Display	12	6	14	3	19	54	36%	7%
Total	42	15	37	14	40	148

Based on the data, reporters seem to tweet their personal opinions within news stories at a higher rate than displaying their personal lives in work-related tweets. Notably, Proskow and Haines did not frequently use Twitter individualistically, but did tweet individualized journalistically at high rates. Thus, suggesting that both Proskow and Haines were more prone to blur journalistic and individualistic use rather than using Twitter solely as an individual. Moreover, Bliss tweeted both individualistic and individualized journalistic content at similarly rates, demonstrating that Bliss employs individualistic uses of Twitter to a great extent within the tweets of his personal Twitter account. Most notably, Avery Haines of City News tweeted individualized journalistically at a higher rate than solely journalistically, as 52% of her total tweets (n=71) were coded as Individualized Journalistic. This reveals that Haines does not uphold journalistic norms on Twitter to the same extent as her counterparts and that Haines uses her personal Twitter account to blur journalistic and individualistic uses more than any other reporter.

3.1 Opinion Based News

From the tweets coded as Individualized Journalistic, 64% of them consisted of personal opinion embedded in a news story. These tweets appeared to be disseminating the news, however, upon closer inspection, these tweets also alluded to the personal opinion of the news reporter. Thus, these tweets were a blur of both journalistic and individualistic uses of Twitter. An example of this type of tweet can be seen when Jackson Proskow of Global News tweeted: “Err, happy Monday? RT @AnthonyFarnell: Tomorrow's forecast about as miserable as it gets by mid April standards.” In this tweet, Proskow is completing two tasks: he is relaying the weather forecast to his followers (disseminating the news) while adding his personal opinion on he feels about this weather forecast (“Err, happy Monday?”) Proskow’s individualistic use of Twitter is seen within those three words, which add opinion to what might otherwise be a journalistic practice of sharing the weather forecast.

Paul Bliss of CTV News enacts another example of personal opinion within a news story in his tweet: “Ont to invest $150mil for tech in classrooms. And, this sure does snd like elxn speech. Long, considering it's not a crowd of party faithful". While engaging in the journalistic practice of real-time reporting and tweeting about a cabinet meeting, Bliss also adds his personal judgment to the tweet by labeling a speech as an "election speech". In this tweet, Bliss is disseminating the news, but also suggesting his personal opinion of the speech, therefore blurring the journalistic and individualistic uses of Twitter.

A final example of personal opinion on a news item is demonstrated when Katie Simpson of CP24, tweeted: "Lots of swear words in the ITO.... #robford #topoli #jestsayin" about an Information To Obtain document pertaining to the Rob Ford drug use allegations. Although there may indeed be swear words in the document, this is her opinion of the document and not news directly pertaining to the document. Journalists have a responsibility to uphold the role of non-partisan gatekeeper of the news. However, in these individualized journalistic tweets, reporters are showcasing their personal bias of the news stories, thus challenging their professional roles as objective gatekeepers.

The conception of impartiality, where journalists eliminate their personal opinions from the news, has been a fundamental standard in the journalism profession for years (Kovach & Rosenstiel, 2001; Schudson, 2001). There have been designated spaces in the media for news reporting and separate areas for opinion and commentary. However, the unstructured, open space of Twitter facilitates the public expression of personal commentary within a personal public (Lüders, 2008), thus allowing the blend of both reporting and interpretation.

Tweets that demonstrate personal opinion mixed with a news story align with the findings of Lasorsa et al. (2011). Their research revealed biases in journalistic reporting on Twitter. The results of Lasorsa et al. as well as the results of this study demonstrate instances where journalists exhibit non-traditional journalistic practices on Twitter. Journalists defend this intermingling of fact and opinion by emphasizing that news on Twitter is a story that evolves over time and the verification of sources and information takes place as time progresses (Broersma & Graham, 2013). Thus, the nature of Twitter as a platform for sharing information encourages this mixing of fact and opinion in the tweets from the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters. Journalists who tweet from their personal Twitter accounts are able to take advantage of the neutral platform of Twitter. By doing so, they do not face the same necessity to uphold their roles as gatekeepers, as they would if writing from an organizational Twitter account (Lasorsa et al., 2012).

3.2 Personal Lives On Display

The remaining tweets coded as Individualized Journalistic were used to showcase aspects of the personal lives of the local television news reporters, while still being journalistic in their intentions. For example, Jackson Proskow of Global News, tweeted: “Have we reached “peak beard?” Shave it ain't so. <http://bbc.in/1m74rpD> ”. This tweet demonstrates Proskow’s personal interest to his own facial hair, but this tweet is also used journalistically as it disseminates a news story from the BBC. Proskow’s beat is politics, thus this tweet about personal hygiene is journalistically off-topic. However it does highlight his personal humour and what he deems personally relevant, as he is personally vested in his own beard. Within the same tweet, Proskow’s followers attain a glimpse of his personal interests, as well receive a news story.

Another example of a tweet showcasing the personal life of a reporter, while also being journalistic is when Avery Haines of City News tweeted: “So proud to accept 2 RTDNA awards on behalf of the most excellent @CityNews team. pic.twitter.com/C6EnrDUBDI”.

Journalistically, Haines is promoting City News as a successful news organization in this tweet. However, she is also individualistically revealing her personal and emotional pride upon acceptance of the award. Thus, in this single tweet, Avery is tweeting journalistically by promoting the news organization she works at, and also individualistically, by sharing her personal sense of satisfaction. These types of individualized journalistic tweets reveal personal aspects of the reporters, as well fulfill journalistic uses of Twitter.

In these tweets, journalists share information that did not pertain to their news beat but instead revealed aspects of their personal lives. Twitter, as a social media platform, can be used as personal media (Lüders, 2008), where users have a large degree of control over what they communicate and how they do so. Thus, journalists are able to select and present information of personal relevance. As Neuberger et al. (2013) suggest, the decision to tweet stories that showcase one's personal life may be based on their perceptions of their Twitter audience, and what the journalist believes his or her followers want to know about. Twitter offers journalists a unique environment where they are able to communicate freely without being constrained by their organizational standards or traditional journalistic principles.

Twitter is thus allowing journalists to be more liberal with their thoughts and opinions (Lasorsa et al., 2012), permitting journalists to take advantage of this method of personal expression and not necessarily stay on-topic journalistically (Hermida, 2013). These individualized journalistic tweets demonstrate how journalists are engaging in Twitter's affordance as a personal public (Lüders, 2008), where information is selected by criteria of personal relevance, rather than journalistic significance (Wu, Hofman, Mason & Watts 2011).

Implications

This study examined the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters and has various implications for research on journalistic Twitter use. The first implication is that previous research assumes that all journalists use Twitter in the same way (Lasorsa et al., 2011; Singer, 2005; Sherwood and Nicholson, 2012). However, this study highlights the differences among the reporters in terms of their journalistic Twitter use. For example, some journalists use their personal Twitter accounts to promote the news, whereas others partake in conversations. Reporters have found different ways to use Twitter, depending on his or her reporting beat or how they use Twitter to fulfill a journalistic task.

Another implication is that there are distinct benefits for journalists to use their own personal Twitter accounts. For instance, by tweeting under their own name and not the designation of their newsroom, journalists are able to personalize their content. This is demonstrated in both the categories of Individualistic Twitter use and Individualized Journalistic Twitter use.

The final implication of this study is that individuals find their own socially constructed ways of using Twitter, regardless of the functions and features attributed to the platform. This implication is supported by the social construction of technology theory, as put forth by Pinch and Bijker (1984). This theory argues that rather than technology regulating human activity, human actions shape technology. As demonstrated by the findings of this study, each reporter used Twitter in differing ways and it was their human activity that managed how they used Twitter. Moreover, boyd & Ellison (2007) suggest that although Twitter has consistent technological features, their uses and practices vary. The five examined local television news reporters in this study demonstrated these varying techniques by their differing uses of Twitter.

Conclusion

The findings from this study suggest that journalists do not exclusively use their personal Twitter accounts to tweet journalistically, individualistically or as a synthesis of both categories. As demonstrated in the data, instances of all three types of Twitter use were revealed. Of the data set, 74% of the tweets from the personal Twitter accounts of local television news reporters were coded as Journalistic, 8% of the tweets were coded as Individualistic and 18% of the tweets blurred journalistic and individualistic use. Moreover each reporter used their personal Twitter accounts in very distinct and diverse ways. For example, Jackson Proskow of Global news used Twitter as an extension of his reporting beat and thus engaged in Real-Time Reporting most frequently. Katie Simpson of CP24 used her Twitter account to report the news as well as breaking news. Steven D'Souza of CBC News promoted news content at a high rate, using links as a method of newsroom website promotion. Avery Haines did not use her personal Twitter account to tweet journalistically, but mostly tweeted individualized journalistic content and finally, Paul Bliss used his personal Twitter account more socially than others, either by engaging in journalistic conversations or individualized uses such as sharing personal interests at high rates.

This study on the content of the tweets from journalists' personal Twitter accounts reveals that a number of tweets extend beyond factual news stories. The findings of this study demonstrate how journalists are negotiating a platform where the differentiation between professional and personal communication fluctuates, and the roles of journalist and individual are sometimes blurred. Even within the bounds of journalistic twitter use, this study demonstrates variation. This diversification in journalistic Twitter use suggests that Twitter is a communication platform that makes it possible for individuals to interpret professional norms of practice differently. Specifically, these individual reporters had their own accounts and found ways to adapt Twitter to their own personal and professional needs.

This study suggests that local television news reporters are primarily using their personal Twitter accounts to tweet journalistically. Thus, they are abiding to the traditional norms and practices as set forth by professional journalism. Journalists on Twitter are able to maintain their roles as non-partisan gatekeepers, as well as demonstrate transparency in their newsgathering. Individualistic uses of Twitter from the personal accounts of local television news reporters are also highlighted in this study. These journalists were able to share personal information with their followers, such as personal hobbies, interests, thoughts and emotions, as well as instances of their day-to-day lives and insights into their private lives. Thus, individuals such as journalists can use Twitter as a platform to foster personal expression. Finally, through the blurring of journalistic and individualistic uses of Twitter, this study demonstrates that journalists mixed facts with opinions and also shared news stories that may not have been journalistically on-topic to their reporting beat, but rather of relevance to their personal lives. These findings suggest that social media may have a variable influence on the traditional gatekeeping role assumed by journalists.

Based on this study, journalists are using their personal Twitter accounts in varying ways. The majority of these local television news reporters primarily used Twitter to tweet and promote the news. However, there were also manifestations of journalistic conversations and crowdsourcing. Thus, news reporters are using their personal Twitter accounts to tweet journalistically, but there is variation in how they use Twitter for journalistic purposes. When using Twitter individualistically, journalists are having personal conversations as well as remarking on their daily routines, personal hobbies and interests and private lives.
